They literally chuck their food; and it would be more correct to say of them at the table, using their own unique term, that they are "chucking" than that they are "eating." When a meal is ready the cook opens the door and calls and the men rush in with a silent, grim, determined energy that is suggestive of a gathering of old soldiers in the banquet rooms of Walhalla. The secret of this is that the men all wear rub bers or "packs," and so movover the floor without noise; and the eargerness with which they crowd forward, bareheaded, with swinging arms, and legs striding far, and all without a sound, almost makes the belic place of resort or amusement in this state.

If there were only one table and food enough for a dozen of them, they would, it is easy to see, scramble and fight for it like savages, and the strongest ones among them, that is, the greatest bully and glutton would be elected chief. But there is plenty, as they know, and so each goes to his place, loads his plate and begins chucking without ceremony. For five minutes you hear nothing but the incessant clashing and clattering of knives and forks against tin plates and see nothing but the u, ward erk of a hundred hands and the down ward bob of fifty heads as, midway, the well-trained jaws, agape, are catching the chuck on the fly! By that time the stomach has got fairly to work, the sensation of hunger is relaxing its grip, the social instincts begin to exert them selves again, the savages are once more becoming civilized. Here and there you hear them talking. Quip and quirk are on the wing, contentment is in the air. In five minutes more the place has become jovial and the more skillful chuckers are leaving the room with pipe and tobacco in hand, to finish the meal with the inevitable smoke. Then off to work, and a repetition of the scene at the next meal.
